Date: 1.24.10

Series: In the Beginning

Text: Genesis 1

Synopsis: If you've watched CSI you are familiar with the scene. There's been an apparent murder in your neighborhood. The house is cordoned off by yellow tape, squad cars surround the property, concerned and nosy neighbors are peering into the controlled pandemonium. Uniformed officers and plain clothed detectives are scurrying about collecting evidence. Emergency technicians take the covered body out of the house and to the morgue for further investigation.

Based on the evidence, investigators are soon able to determine that this is a crime scene. The front door was kicked in. No weapon is found. The trajectory of the shot and the lack of gunpowder residue rule out a self-inflicted wound. Everyone is quite certain they are looking for a murderer.

But what if Darwinian scientists conducted the investigation? They would certainly look at the material evidence and conclude that somebody was killed, but they could not conclude that there was a murderer because there was no direct evidence that he existed. They would then embark on a fanciful journey to somehow explain how the death took place. They may hypothesize that moisture in the air along with excessively hot temperatures caused the house to expand and then suddenly contract, causing the door to burst open. The sudden change in temperature along with the wind generated by the imploding door caused particles to suddenly form and then harden taking on the composition of a bullet-like substance, which subsequently careened into the temple of the hapless victim. Since all of this is theorized, scientists need to spend countless hours and resources in order to further examine the evidence to prove that their hypothesis is true. After years of research, they conclude that although they know little more than when they began, certainly all the activity has proven that their theory was true in the first place and should now be received as fact. Meanwhile the murderer has long since escaped and is happily living in Costa Rica. Aren't you glad Darwinian scientists don't solve crime?
